Continuation of 11. does NOT place the application in condition for allowance because: With respect to claim 1, Applicant argues that Rocha et al. does not teach or suggest both the photodiode and the A/D converter reside on a same CMOS semiconductor structure. However, both the photodiode and A/D converter are located on a same CMOS block, as stated in the abstract, as again suggested in section 1, and in section 2 (pages 121-122; Figures 2 and 3). With respect to claim 17, Applicant argues that Boles et al. fails to teach the first and second components as residing on a same integrated chip (IC). However, Boles clearly states in the abstract and paragraphs 3 and 4 of the introduction a device with the ability to digitize the detector signal "on chip", providing added flexibility to the design. Therefore, Applicant's arguments are not persuasive and do not put the claims in the condition for allowance.
